Living in water definitely helps support their bulk. Seeing as I'm posting, I'd also like to take the opportunity to correct a common misconception that some people have - the reason that many prehistoric species grew large (sauropods, for example) is NOT due to there being more oxygen in the air. The only exception was in the Carboniferous, where massive forests spanned the continents ...

Glacial ice can range in age from several hundred to several hundreds of thousands years, making it valuable for climate research. To see a long-term climate record, scientists can drill and extract ice cores from glaciers and ice sheets. Ice cores have been taken from around the world, including Peru, Canada, Greenland, Antarctica, Europe, and Asia.
