some step in the proof went wrong, that is, that there is a sentence in the proof that is not a tautological consequence of the premises. Suppose there is such a sentence, call it Q. Q is derived from some prior sentences by one of our inference rules. So now we have a proof by cases. In each case suppose one of the inference rules was responsible

We will start right from the beginning, assuming no prior exposure to this or similar material, and progress through discussions of the proof and model theories of propositional and first-order logic. We will proceed by giving a theory of truth, and of logical consequence, based on a formal language called FOL (the language of First-Order Logic).

Many answers to these questions have been explored. Some people have claimed that the laws of logic are simply a matter of convention. If this is so, logic and convention we could presumably decide to change the conventions, and so adopt different principles of logic, the way we can decide which side of the road we drive on.
